These initiatives include agricultural experiences where students learn how to take care of the kaki tree.

Together with time capsules, the kaki tree was planted by children on top of a hill with a view.

During the World War I, a number of lives were also taken at this small town, which created people’s yearning for freedom, love of family, equality, and peace. As a hundred years had passed since the end of the war, they applied for planting of a second generation A-bombed kaki tree sapling as a monument to preserve memories of the tragedy in the town and the A-bombing at the end of the World War II.

10 years later, all the people involved in the planting will be invited to an anniversary event to recall the planting ceremony. Stones painted by children were placed around the kaki tree sapling to express their resolution not to forget their aspiration for peace and to preserve the tragic memories.

It was a talk about the Kaki Tree Project by a Japanese fourth-grade student that raised sympathy of classmates and led this project to be introduced at the school.

The kaki tree will become a symbol of peace and a “testifier” that is handed over from the fifth-grade students (the last grade of elementary schools in Italy) to the first-grade students. First, the fifth-grade students take care of the tree for a year and will hand it over to the next first-grade students.

At the planting ceremony, craftworks primarily representing Japanese people’s respect for the nature and others, patience, and persistence were exhibited, involving not only students of the school but also local community members.

At the 10th anniversary, grown-up graduates (21- and 16-year-old) will be invited and gather together with senior students (11-year-old) under the kaki tree.
